

5 Things Ive Learned

At their essence lawyers are problem solvers. Clients look to lawyers to guide them through some of their most difficult and challenging issues. As counselors, we must be conscious of our clients objectives and expectations. Understanding our clients objectives and expectations and being able to analyze them within a commercial context requires more than just second-hand knowledge. It requires an understanding of the clients personal and commercial motivations. To be a successful commercial litigator, a lawyer must understand his or her clients business and know the facts and the laws governing the particular issues so that they can develop an effective strategy aimed at achieving the clients objectives all the while, managing the clients expectations. I handle this topic differently from other attorneys in this role because I bring significant, practical business experience to my legal practice. Before pursuing a law degree, I was an accountant and worked in the financial and chemical industries. I use my industry experience as a commercial lens to focus on my clients issues. I bring practical business sense to each matter. I develop dispute resolution strategies with the advantage of this first-hand business knowledge. I began my legal career as an active duty Navy Judge Advocate General. I was a prosecutor who learned to put together the evidence to prove the elements of the alleged crime as well as learned how to assess the expectations of senior non-attorney naval officers who wanted a just and fair trial but also demanded that their military mission not be compromised by the military justice system. Through my broad background I have developed additional tools, beyond strict legal mechanisms. These tools allow me to work with clients, to appreciate their objectives, manage their expectations and to work with them to develop creative solutions to their business disputes.
