

Baltimores Flawed Renaissance: The Failure of Plan-Control-Subsidize Redevelopment (Perspectives on Eminent Domain Abuse Book 3)

Although Baltimores Inner Harbor is often touted as the example par excellence of government-subsidized redevelopment, Baltimore is today two cities, separate but unequal, not in spite of its extravagant and interventionist redevelopment program, but because of it, finds a new study from the Institute for Justice. Baltimores Flawed Renaissance: The Failure of Plan-Control-Subsidize Redevelopment, by Loyola College Economics Professor Stephen J.K. Walters and graduate Louis Miserendino, closely examines Baltimores 50-year failed attempt to bring investment back into the city. Baltimores Flawed Renaissance is the Institute for Justices third Perspectives on Eminent Domain Abuse, a series of independently authored reports that examine eminent domain abuse from the vantage point of noted national experts. According to Walters and Miserendino, Baltimores plan, control and subsidize doctrine is antithetical to the types of policies that would have created a far more inviting environment for investment and a far more organic, widely shared and enduring renewal. Often, areas that were well-functioning (if unappealing in planners eyes) became emptied-out slums only after they were designated as part of a renewal area or were unlucky enough to sit in the path of a planner transit artery thought necessary to revitalize downtown, Walters and Miserendino continue.
