

A Devotee

A Devotee - An Episode in the Life of a Butterfly Mary Cholmondeley began writing with serious intent in her teens. She wrote in her journal in 1877, What a pleasure and interest it would be to me in life to write books. I must strike out a line of some kind, and if I do not marry (for at best that is hardly likely, as I possess neither beauty nor charms) I should want some definite occupation, besides the home duties. She succeeded initially in publishing initially some stories in The Graphic and elsewhere. Her first novel was The Danvers Jewels (1887), a detective story that won her a small following. This appeared in the magazine Temple Bar, published by Richard Bentley, after the fellow novelist Rhoda Broughton had introduced to George Bentley there. It was followed by Sir Charles Danvers (1889), Diana Tempest (1893) and A Devotee (1897)
