

Legal Communication as a sort of 'legal language' can be seen as inherent a part of Comparative Law, but even the most talented linguists will fail in their analysis if the recipients of legi-linguistic information informed them that they do not genuinely comprehend the cognitive matter delivered on the part of linguists does not understand them. The author wishes to show the importance of understanding of language, as it is impossible to communicate without it. As an example the author will use the development of Civil Codes in some post-communist jurisdictions. This paper will look in this respect on the development of Civil Codes of Hungary, Lithuania and Ukraine. This paper will indicate the possible mistakes that the legislators commit when they try to use foreign or international legislations. It is presumed that law can be seen as a kind of Esperanto, a universal doctrine that can be implemented in any state. The author will show that to do so there is a need for deeper reflection on the topic before putting such reflection in ink.
