

Cohabitation - Our home, but whose house? The legal minefield called the family home.

Couples who split up can find themselves in difficult and unforeseen circumstances when it comes to looking at who has what share of the family home. This is because the law is inconsistent and outcomes are uncertain. It is often assumed that the proceeds from the sale of the house will be split equally but this is not necessarily the case and the end result can come as an unpleasant surprise. This book looks at the different circumstances people can find themselves in when cohabiting and offers friendly and practical advice in helping to improve their situation as regards the house they are living in together. The law is relevant to every age group from the younger generation through to those older people who may have divorced previously and are now cohabiting. You need to find the situation that most resembles your own in the contents page and then look in the text to see how you stand and what you could do. Given the emotional and financial investment that is made in the family home, it is essential that every cohabitee understands their own situation and the consequences of a relationship breakdown. Too much is at stake to ignore this information and guidance.
