On taking hold here, so tightly were the comminuted parts held together that the only effect of the application of force with the intention of elevating one of the pieces was to produce a most alarming depression of the other fragments. The haemorrhage continuing and the several attempts to raise the bone having failed, the skull was rapidly trephined in an advantageous position, Diagram (natural size, and taken from the pieces of bone which were removed after they had been fitted together). The breaking away of the inner table to a greater extent than the outer and the close and even fitting of the fragments at the lines of fracture is represented. The depression partly caused the locking of the fragments, as it was not abrupt, and any attempt at elevation only jammed them more tightly together, hence the resort to the trephine. The foramen is for the middle meningeal artery. the smallest instrument being employed. With the forceps numerous pieces of broken skull, some large and some small, could then with ease be removed. The two lowest pieces of bone were not loose like the rest, but were pulled away because it was thought that asepsis could with less difficulty be maintained in their absence. The main trunk of the middle meningeal artery was exposed for some distance as soon as one of these fragments through which it passed was avulsed. The two primary branches of the vessel were broken across and required ligaturing with catgut. The area of the dura mater now in view was considerable. In front a ragged opening through the membrane was visible,
