Thus, in the series of observations above mentioned, the only experiments in which any considerable variation of the pressure in the carotid was indicated, (a degree of variation corresponding with what is felt by the finger, and with the manner in which the closed end of the main artery is seen to pulsate in amputation wounds, or in which blood is projected in jets from these vessels when wounded), are amongst those made upon the largest 1 In the following table are included the details of all the experiments recorded in Professor Volkinanns works, in which these are fully given:--Taking the mean of the numbers in the above columns for the three sets of observations respectively, wc 6ud them to be:--A. 184-59-2 124-8 121-1 140-3 +19-2 B.... 197 158-4 38-6 1777 169--8-7 C.... 127 116 11-122-5 93-5-29 animal experimented upon. And in the other cases, while a more or less considerable oscillation of the mercurial column occurred in connection with the larger vessels, its variations were scarcely noticeable in the smaller arteries; and in the carotid and femoral arteries of a horse, Hales found that when the variations of pressure were measured by the oscillations of a column of the blood itself, these were not more than two or three inches in extent in a column of about eight feet. Such experiments give a very approximate value of the maximum force of the blood, but no indication of its minimum value. If, in the above t...
